“Rural arts are different from urban arts, but in unexpected ways. We often are predisposed to think that rural arts are smaller-scale versions of arts activities in larger towns and cities, or that they are not professional in a mainstream sense. But, in fact, rural arts have a richness and complexity congruent with anything seen in larger centres and have distinct characteristics that arise precisely because these activities happen in particular rural or community settings.” – John Brotman, Ontario Arts Council, at a Canadian Cultural Observatory workshop.
